Copper Drip Pan

General

This pan is a superior cooking utensil. It is constructed of heavy gauge copper and lined with tin for safe food preparation. The hardware is hand-wrought iron with copper rivets.

Assembly

The copper drip pan comes fully assembled and ready to operate.

Usage

To use, simply place the pan directly under the food after the SpitJack apparatus has been fully assembled (see the user manual for the SpitJack model you are using). After the food has finished cooking, carefully lift the pan and "catch" the food as the spit gets disconnected from the SpitJack.

Cooking with the pan

"Always use a low flame. Copper is such a good conductor that the whole pot heats evenly. The lower heat keeps your tin from blistering and thus protects the lining. Never use metal utensils, only plastic or wood." (From <http://www.retinning.com/faqs.htm>)

Maintenance

The only common maintenance necessary is to make sure the hardware does not rust. This is best accomplished by occasionally cleaning with a light abrasive (if necessary) and then lightly wiping with a vegetable or mineral oil.

The tin lining is not designed to be permanent (like stainless steel) and eventually will have to be "re-tinned." This should not be needed before years of normal usage. Care should be taken, however, not to scrub the tinned surface too hard when cleaning. If the copper starts to be visible through the tinned surface, call a local plating company for service (assuming your pan is out of warranty) or try this web site <http://www.retinning.com> .

The copper surfaces will tarnish normally with use and age. To restore your pan to a beautiful luster, polish with a good copper cleaner (we recommend Wright's) "Many traditional chefs combine flour, white vinegar, and coarse salt with an egg white until the mixture is consistency of paste, then rubbed on the outside of the pots." (From <http://www.retinning.com/faqs.htm>)
